HOW TO PURSUE A CAREER IN BUSINESS EVEN IF YOU DON’T MAJOR IN ECONOMICS

Pursue the Technology Management Certificate Program (TMP) or just take courses offered in the program:

Make your major more marketable by obtaining a part- or full-time internship. Consider doing more than one!

Work part- or full-time during summer and/or school to gain experience and skills useful in your career search. Did you know GPA is considered the 7th out of 10th most important criteria used by employers surveyed? Related experience and the following skills count as more important:

- Communication
- Leadership
- Teamwork
- Computer skills

Consider a minor in a related field, such as the writing program or a foreign language, which would complement your educational and career plans more effectively.

Become involved in student clubs and organizations

Join a professional organization

Perform informational interviews
It’s been stated that factors other than your major play a much more important role in your employability. Related work experience will often make a student much more marketable. The ability to interact with others, cope with pressure, speaking skills, problem-solving skills and the ability to cope with change were rated as the top 5 skills most valued by recent graduates. Strong writing skills and computer related skills were next on the list. Salaries appear initially higher for engineering majors, but surveys show repeatedly how liberal arts majors often do better in management tracks where salary potentials often bypass those without such a broad based education.
